Speeding up recovery. Muscle cells are most receptive to carbohydrate during the first two hours following a training session. To accelerate recovery, consume 300-400 calories of carbohydrate shortly after the training session and another 300-400 Calories of carbohydrate within two hours. This intake of carbohydrates as well as replenishing the fuel stores, also have a positive effect on protein restoration in muscles.

The body's metabolism slows down, in order to prevent it from going into the starvation phase. When you restrict, the brain receives signals that it is hungry and requires food for fuel, which can make it difficult to eat mindfully. This increase in appetite can lead to over-eating or bingeing later in the day.
